Through this study we tried to identify the barriers that young people from EU encounter in entering the labor market, because the development of human society constantly changes of economic, social and political circumstances have led to increased knowledge and skills of individuals.

Necessary data for this study were collected using a sociological survey, the instrument used was a questionnaire, which we applied to pupils, students and university graduates. Then, these results were compared with the results obtained in other studies at EU level.

The main conclusions we have reached regarding barriers show that: the barriers are created by employers, by skills too diverse and complex as they require of young people employment, and young people through their attitude without interest and seriousness. We offer some suggestions on action that institutions can perform to try to resolve these barriers for young people.
